Understanding Suicide

When someone is thinking of taking their own life it can be frightening for everyone involved. You might find it hard to understand what they are going through and you might be uncertain as to how you can help.

Understanding how someone feels when suicidal is important they are probably feeling depressed and hopeless for the future, they may have lost all hope for change and they may believe nothing will improve, their feelings may be overwhelming they may see themselves as being a burden on those around them and that everyone would be better off without them no longer being around.

They want to end the pain that they are living with and believe that there is no other solutions to the problems they face. Although they may have made a plan to end their life many people still wish for and hope for a different option up until the very end. Reaching out for support and connecting with a non-judgemental person who will listen is the first step toward achieving a positive outcome.

Having as many people trained who can support someone who is in suicidal crisis is an important step in enabling them to get the right support, right when they need it. We recommend all our coaches and managers are trained in ASIST and SafeTALK is offered to all our players 16+. Suicide TALK is targeted at friends and family

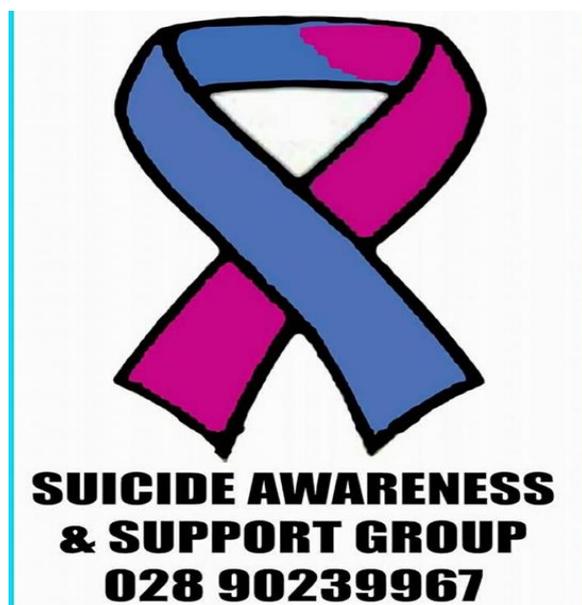

The only clear way to know if someone is thinking about suicide is to ask them, sometimes people thinking of suicide may hide the signs so as not to be discovered. Sometimes we don't recognise the signs even though they may seem obvious when we look back. This is often because we were too close to the situation at the time.

What to watch out for

- Disconnecting from friends and family
- Depression or very low mood
- Negative comments about self
- Threatening suicide
- Talking or writing about suicide
- Sudden change from distress to saying they are OK or everything is ok (This may indicate they have decided to take their life)
- Putting personal affairs in order
- Giving away things they own
- Self-Harm or Suicide attempt

This is not a prescriptive list the only real way to know if someone is thinking about suicide is to ask them directly – Asking about suicide will not put the thought into someone's head.

Look after yourself

Supporting someone who is experiencing suicidal thoughts can take a toll on you too.

It is important to also look after your own mental health and to try not to take on more than you feel comfortable with. Put in place support for yourself so that you can continue to give help.

If necessary seek self-support. You are NOT betraying the individual by turning to others for support for yourself. Talking to someone, joining a support group, or confiding in a trusted friend will help you continue to help others. You don't need to go into detail or betray confidences; instead focus on your emotions and what you are feeling. Make sure you can be totally honest with the person you turn to — no judging your emotions!

The training also outlined in this toolkit offers individuals the chance to become more suicide alert and enable you to get a person with thoughts of suicide to helping resources. Some of these can be found below.
