NATURE NOTES 17

Brian Davis

Where have all the kestrels gone? When and where did you last see a Windhover? – Morning's minion, kingdom of daylight's dauphin, dapple-dawn-drawn Falcon, in his riding of the rolling level underneath him steady air. There always used to be one or two in the village, and one or more perched on wires or hovering beside the road to Kimbolton. Colleagues from Monks Wood say that they too have noticed their scarcity this year. They suggest that the long cold winter and dry summer have both been bad for voles and thus for kestrels, and the scrubbing up of road verges may also hinder kestrels feeding. Buzzards, too, have been less reported in Easton this year though they are now thought to be the most common raptor in the country and there are more than enough rabbits for them surely! Moles have gone berserk in my garden, invading my lawn on three fronts and even one of the raised beds – probably young ones in search of pastures new. But has anyone seen a hedgehog this year? Ted and May discovered an unusual and attractive flower by their back gate last month. This was Moth Mullein, which I last saw by the former cottage in what is now the Burton's front garden in September 1967! The seed can survive for decades waiting for some disturbance to germinate. It's a bumper year for migrant butterflies, I'm told, and hundreds of Camberwell Beauties have been seen in Norfolk, so look out for a very large butterfly with purple wings and creamy borders on your Buddleias.
