Dear People,

Here is the concluding part of the Homily at the Eucharist by the Australian bishop, Geoffrey Robinson. Thank you for the comments you have made about this "song of faith".

"There was always a tension between the beauty of the song and the weakness and the pettiness that I found within myself and in so many others who shared this song with me, but the song sustained me throughout the years.

"But then the darkness of evil within the Church gathered around me, and at times it was so deep that it seemed that the very song itself had been conquered. But in the depths of that darkness, when my clinging to the song was based on blind faith rather than on any warm feeling within me, I realised that the song is quite simply part of who I am and it is in the darkness that it is most important to me.

"The song must not stop with us and we in our turn must sing it to others. In doing this we must remember that this song has two special characteristics.

"The first is that we, too, will never sing the song as well as Jesus did - our voices lack strength and go flat, we misunderstand the words - but, if we sing this song to the best of our ability, people do not hear only our voices. Behind us and through us they hear a stronger and a surer voice, the voice of Jesus.

"The second is that we always sing the song better if we can learn to sing it together - not one voice here, another there, each singing different words to different melodies, but all singing the one song in harmony. Then people will truly know that it is still the most beautiful song the world has ever known."

God bless us all to sing the song in harmony, each in our own voice.

Fr. John

Catholic Women Speak

began as a group forum on Facebook and, to date, nearly 3,000 Catholic women from around the world engage in discussion about issues relevant to their lives as women in the Catholic Church, seen through the many different cultures and societies from which they come. Some may remember, or even have read, the CWS book "Bringing our Gifts to the Table", published in 2015 and given to the bishops and cardinals involved in the Synod on the Family in October of that same year. Members of the Catholic Women Speak community will soon be meeting to plan for local discussion groups outside of Facebook.

If you would like to know more, possibly share in the planning, please contact Alison on 0116 2207881 or email Alison.CWS@outlook.com.
